

I am concerned about a move to prioritize low-power FM stations over current FM-translators. I am a huge fan of K-LOVE radio, a listener-supported network of stations that broadcasts across America. I listen to K-LOVE for several hours a day, both at home in the morning (my wakeup station on my clock-radio) and commuting to work. I enjoy their positive programming and absence of commercials. I also enjoy listening to the same quality music when I travel around America, through local stations in many of the cities that I visit.

K-LOVE provides family-friendly, positive music that is a wonderful service to our local community. It is a wonderful contrast to much of the loud, negative songs and filthy lyrics all too often found across the radio dial. It is a quality station that parents are not afraid of having on the radio when children can hear it. It is a much-needed alternative to the rock-shock, lewd rap, etc. programming on all too many stations.

I'm sure that Low Power FM stations will also provide a useful alternative. However, I would urge you not to boost this service at the expense of FM translator services such as K-LOVE radio.

Sincerely,
